ABSTRACT

This loose-leaf collection includes a brief discussion of usage procedures for International Planned Parenthood Federation (IPPF) libraries. A set of annotated bibliographies follows, including descriptions of documents on the following topics: family planning and biomedical science, social sciences related to family planning, education and communication in family planning, international conferences, Africa, Americas, Asia, Europe, Middle East, and Oceania. An author index follows the annotated bibliography section. A brief position paper outlining plans for an interconnection network of worldwide IPPF libraries concludes the document. (RE)

Workshop on Systems Interconnections, Kuala Lumpur, April 12-16 1976

IPPF Position Paper by J. Forget, Head of Library and Documentation Service.

Over the past three years the International Planned Parenthood Federation has developed its capacity for handling both bibliographic and factual information to ensure as complete a coverage of literature and developments in family planning as is feasible. In this effort the interesting development of international information systems, in operation or experimental, such as MEDLINE, AGRIS and CORE has been taken into account. The philosophy underlining these systems is that each participating organisation contributes to them according to its means and benefits from them according to its needs.

Any international information network on population and family planning should be the result of better handling of information at national level as well as of general efforts towards standardisation and complementarity. It should be co-ordinated with the emerging national systems which are planned along the guidelines of the UNESCO National Information Systems programme, NATIS, and of UNISIST. One essential feature of the NATIS programme is its flexibility. It is not pressing for computerisation of catalogues where no national technological infrastructure can guarantee success, but rather it advocates the linkage of the development of documentation centres with the overall development plans of the country.

The recent report on DEVSIS (1), an International information system for the development sciences, constitutes a model outline of such international systems. It draws on the actual progress which has been made in documentation methods, independent of hardware technology.

This includes:

- library catalogues
- subject indexing
- preparation of summaries and abstracts
- union catalogues
- dissemination procedures, by way of photocopies, microfiches, etc.

Standards have been developed for all these activities by the International Standardisation Organisation, ISO and by the United Nations agencies. In our opinion, all forms of documentation organisation should take into account this methodologic basis rather than be developed in isolation.

(1) to be obtained from Mr. John E. Woolston, Director, DEVSIS study team, IDRC, PO Box 8500 - Ottawa, Canada KIG SH9.

In the matter of the choice of a classification for the physical arrangement of documents on shelves or in files, the Population and Family Planning Classification scheme is recommended by IPPF to the libraries which it assists when they are autonomous and when the development of the collection in the socio-economic field is foreseen. When they are not autonomous, for instance when they are part of a larger institution, university or government service which is already following a universal classification (Dewey, UDC, LC), it is advised not to break with the prevailing system but rather to improve it by way of insertion of specific sub-divisions borrowed from the IPPF scheme.

As regards subject indexing, those centres which follow the IPPF scheme should not need any other tool since its terms are generally reconciled with two existing thesauri, that of the Carolina Population Center, TIS and of the International Institute for the Study of Human Reproduction, University of Columbia. On the other hand, those centres which are following a non-specific classification (Dewey, UDC, LC) can usefully adopt either of these thesauri for information retrieval. Regarding this, three remarks should be made:

- whilst specialised classifications serve the double purpose of the physical organisation of documents and the recording and retrieval of information from them by subject, thesauri only serve the latter purpose and therefore always coexist with some form of classification or another, by accession number, or by category.

- retrieval of information by subject, manual or automatic, is directly linked with the specificity of the terms which have served to describe a given work, independently of the form of tool from which these terms are drawn, i.e., classification or thesaurus. In other words it does not matter whether a classification or thesaurus is used as long as it is specific enough for the users needs.

- it follows from what precedes that the adoption of different controlled vocabularies (lists of subject headings, thesauri and classifications) does not preclude systems interconnection and computerisation, as long as the terms are common.

Having used commonly agreed terms (which will no doubt be incorporated into the forthcoming population thesaurus) for the construction of the Population and Family Planning Classification, the Library and Documentation Service of IPPF Central Office is now ready to engage itself in any international cooperative effort in which its data base would be considered useful.

As regards the coverage of literature generated at country level there is no substitute for a concerted effort of all national documentation centres involved. There has been a tendency in the past to turn to international population centres for these tasks, which is quite unrealistic. No substantial results can possibly be achieved without the setting up of proper machinery for exchanging information at national, regional and international level to ensure the exhaustive coverage of published and unpublished studies. In this effort the task to be undertaken by national documentation centres is considerable and simple guidance may have to be offered to assist them in the handling of a greater variety of information than they may be equipped for and in its dissemination to regional and international clearing houses. All centres involved should adopt the same format and presentation for the storing and dissemination of bibliographic data. Ultimately, the target to aim at is for national centres to issue bibliographies of their own country literature and to exchange them with the products of other national centres, with the co-operation of regional and international centres.

The IPPF will be initiating such a scheme in its own network. An area in which it has concentrated its efforts is the improved monitoring of family planning programmes and projects. It is setting up a data bank of family planning programmes and projects, searchable by country and by subject. The IPPF data bank is a collection of standard work sheets on which the essential features of programmes are recorded and the reader is referred to the original source documents for further details.

Both project and bibliographic information are seen as indispensable aids to decision-making and programme planning. It is the hope of the IPPF that the information it can gather in this way can be pooled, with the information gathered by other national and international institutions, into a wider system for the benefit of developing countries.
